EVEREST:

Kathmandu, Nepal — Mount Everest, the world's highest mountain at 8,848.86 meters, continues to attract climbers from around the globe. However, recent developments show that authorities are taking new steps to improve safety and protect the mountain's environment.

The Government of Nepal is planning to introduce stricter rules for climbers who want to summit Mount Everest. According to officials, climbers may soon be required to first climb a mountain higher than 7,000 meters before they are allowed to attempt Everest.

This rule is intended to ensure that climbers have enough experience to face the extreme conditions on the world's tallest peak.

Recently, severe weather in the Everest region also created dangerous conditions for trekkers and climbers. Heavy snowstorms trapped many people near Everest trekking routes, and rescue teams had to assist in evacuating them safely.

NEW PODCAST

Recently, the government of Nepal has discussed introducing new rules for climbers who want to climb Everest. The goal is to make climbing safer and ensure that climbers have enough experience before attempting the summit.
